XIV WHAT RELIGION MEANT TO ABRAHAM LINCOLN Of all things in and around New Salem, from its earliest to its latest days, there was nothing about the little village that existed in forms and opinions more crude and vague than its religion. For the most part its inhabitants had no religion to speak of, in the conventional sense of the word. In the case of any who had held church membership elsewhere, the relation had lapsed with their removal to a community that had no church. Yet perhaps no other hamlet so small and shortlived as New Salem has ever had a citizen whose religion has been more discussed. The people of New Salem and its vicinity were a plain and industrious folk. Their material needs were indeed few as compared with ours; yet they required a diligence in their daily labours to provide for these necessities that absorbed their time and interest to such an extent as only those can appreciate who know the hardship, toil, and exposure endured by the early settlers and their families. Hither came Abraham Lincoln, April 19, 1831. Here he spent most of his next seven years amid various surroundings and associations which became formative and controlling influences in his life. It is important to estimate correctly and to recognize the work he did there; the men with whom he there measured muscle and mind; the women whom he respected and those he admired, and one he...
