Not illustrated. 1854 Excerpt: .relations of things are in nature, and if they are manifold there is no help for it: we may shut our eyes to them, but we cannot lessen them. They have been brought in sundry classes under the thought of men of all nations, as they have shown by the structure of their languages, and our minds will miss the good of what should be a wit-sharpening exercise, the learning of grammar, if we wilfully keep them out of thought. In Basque the genitive and possessive cases are off-marked by two sundry endings or case-forms, (l-j-e.?) and (l--aren); and in French the two associatives are marked by different prepositions; as, Il se promena avec son pere/ with avec for with; and Il ecrit d une plume/ with de for with. Botanists tell us that there are three or four hundred orders of plants, and more than a thousand species of the leguminosa<sup>3.5</sup> It is not by an idle wish that one can know them all, but there is no help for it. Botanists might, it is true, have stopped with the discrimination of the five great classes of plants; but still they would not therefore have lessened the numbers of the orders or species, or made them more like or unlike one another, or have left the knowledge of plants of more easy attainment. Pronouns are of two kinds, pronouns which are used for nouns, and called personal pronouns, and pronouns which are used with, but...
