Excerpt: .on the sea-coast, is noted for the herring fishery. The herrings are caught by the fishermen on the shores of Scotland, as well as on their own coast, and brought to Yarmouth, where they are salted, then hung up in the smoke of a wood fire, and stored away in barrels. Those which are slightly salted and smoked only for a few hours, are called bloaters; but the greater part are buried in salt for ten days; then they are taken up and strung on sticks run through their gills, and smoked for about a fortnight longer; these are called red herrings. The herring fishery begins about Michaelmas, and lasts twelve or fourteen weeks; the mackerel fishery then begins, and lasts through the winter months, many of the boats going as far as Plymouth, in Devonshire, to look after the fish. Other fish are...
